It is officially opened the first sea highway between Spain and France.

The Minister of Public Works, José Blanco, and his French equivalent, the Secretary of State for Transportation, Dominique Bussereau, have officially opened today in Gijón the first sea highway between both countries, linking the Spaniard port with the Nantes one. The aim of this sea highway is to transfer trucks from road to sea, thus clearing Transpyrenean roads and reducing the environmental impact of freight transportation, in particular CO2 emissions, and improve its efficiency, since the vehicles travel thousand kilometres less by road. This route is also intended to reduce traffic on major roads and promote shipping as a complement to land transportation in the context of a sustainable transport policy.
